THROUGH MY EYES

On Saturday May 18 we held a memorial service for my grandfather, Cecil Dye. This was an unusual event from the standpoint that my grandfather passed away 76 years ago in November of 1943 and because he was martyred for his faith. Let me explain.

In 1942 Cecil Dye left a very successful - and still thriving - church that he started in Saginaw to lead a mission team to South America. Their purpose was to reach an uncivilized nomadic tribe - the Ayore people - deep in the Bolivian jungles with the good news of the gospel.

The effort was also a mission of peace as the Ayore people were in constant conflict with the Bolivian people as civilization encroached upon their traditional lands. The first step was to make contact with the elusive natives and it was during this effort that my grandfather and four other men walked into the jungle and were never seen again.

After the disappearance, the remaining team spent months searching for the men and unsuccessfully trying to learn what had happened to them. They also continued the efforts to make contact with the

How Do You Keep Your Home Comfortable in a Cold & Wet Summer?

In order to answer this question, you need to understand why the most important job your air conditioner performs to help you stay comfortable in your home is to remove humidity from the air in your house. Are you surprised by this statement? Here's why:

When our bodies feel hot we perspire - or sweat, if you prefer.

If the air surrounding us is low in humidity it can absorb the moisture from the surface of our skin. This is the process of evaporation, and it makes us feel more comfortable because we feel cooler. Therefore, to be comfortable in the summer we want low humidity. (This is why you may have heard people describe the high temperatures in Arizona as still being comfortable because it is “dry heat”.)

The reverse is true in the winter, when we want to feel warm. By adding humidity to the air, the evaporation process is slowed and our bodies retain heat. We're more comfortable because we feel warmer.

This is why I stated above that the most important job your air conditioner performs to help you stay comfortable in your home is to remove humidity from the air in your house.

If an air conditioner didn't remove humidity it wouldn't make us comfortable: we might feel cool, but we would also feel 'clammy' - 'cold & clammy' - and therefore uncomfortable.

To maximize humidity removal, an air conditioner has to be designed to give it enough 'run time' to be able to perform this important function. This is where the question of the size or capacity of the air conditioner comes into play. It is also where 'bigger' is definitely not 'better': you don't want an air conditioner to cool down your house quickly and not remove the humidity from it. This causes people to set their thermostats at cooler temperatures than needed in order to compensate for the 'clammy' uncomfortable feeling. This also costs you more to run your air conditioner.

So, what happens in a cold & wet summer like we have been experiencing, because, unlike Arizona, Michigan has a lot of humidity even in cooler temperatures? Your air conditioner doesn't get the 'run time' it needs and the air in your home remains humid. The bottom line is that in a cold & wet summer, we can't rely on our air conditioner for humidity removal. The solution? - installing a whole home dehumidifier is how you can keep your home comfortable in a cold & wet summer.

Not only can you dry out your house and feel comfortable when outside temperatures are cooler, but when things finally heat up a whole home dehumidifier actually boosts your air conditioner's performance. For more information, see the enclosed flyer.

Ayore people. Eventually contact was made, and the native language was learned, but there was still no word of what had happened to the men.

By opening up communication with the Ayores, some of the tensions between the Ayores and the Bolivians were able to be quelled. The mission team was also able to translate the Bible into the Ayore tongue and communicate the message of the gospel. Finally, after many years, the truth of what had happened to the five men came out: they had been killed on a first-contact with some of the Ayore people that had gone wrong. In fact, one of the killers, whose life had been changed by the gospel, confessed and apologized for what had happened.

While it was a tragedy, the news of the sacrifice of the five men stirred the hearts of hundreds of men and women around the world who were moved to follow in their footsteps and become missionaries and take the good news of the gospel to other unreached peoples.

Left behind were the families, including my grandmother and her three children – one of whom is my mother, Kay Squires, along with her sister Betty and her brother Paul. Until receiving confirmation, they had held on to the hope that the men had been captured or lost. However, by the time they learned what had happened, life had moved on, and as a result, nothing had ever been done to acknowledge my grandfather or the other men's passing or to bring closure to the family.

A year ago, my cousin Greg and I decided that something should be done to end this oversight. Also, although my grandmother had passed in 1997, all three children are still with us.

The event ended up being held in Port Huron, to allow the placing of a grave marker for him in front of my grandmother's headstone at Woodland cemetery in Port Huron Township. For a memorial 76 years after the fact, it is no surprise that there were very few people at the memorial that actually knew my grandfather personally, and that they had been children at the time of his passing. However, over 120 family and friends came for the memorial service, from all over the U.S. and Canada - and even a few from as far away as Russia and a great-granddaughter from Papua, New Guinea – also a missionary. That so many came, and from so far away is a testament to the esteem that Grandpa Cecil is held in.

I was glad to be able to be part of this event, and to be able to share this heritage with my children. - Daniel Squires
